

A Pattern of Lies: A Bess Crawford Mystery

by Charles Todd

About the Book

In 1916, at the height of the war, an explosion and fire at an armament factory in Kent killed over a hundred men. With Ashton Powder Mill situated so close to the coast --- within reach of German saboteurs --- the army investigated, eventually ruling the event an appalling tragedy. Now, two years later, suspicion, gossip and rumor have raised the specter of murder --- and fingers point to the owner, Philip Ashton, whose son was battlefield nurse Bess Crawford's friend and former patient.

While visiting the Ashtons, Bess finds herself caught up in a venomous show of hostility that doesn't stop with Philip Ashton's arrest. Indeed, someone is out for blood, and the household is all but under siege. The police are hostile --- the Inspector's brother died in the mill explosion --- and refuse to consult either the Army or Scotland Yard. Why, after two years, has the village turned against Ashton?

In France, Bess searches for the only known witness to the explosion, now serving at the Front, and tries to convince him to give evidence about that terrible Sunday morning, only to find herself and the witness hunted by someone intent on preventing anyone from discovering what --- or who --- is behind this web of vicious lies. Uncertain who to trust, she can only rely on her own wits and courage, but how can Bess stop a killer whose face she has never seen?

Philip Ashton is urged to throw himself on the mercy of the court-where he will surely find none. Time is running out. And Bess, at the point of a gun, has only one choice left: to give her life to save the Ashtons.

Discussion Guide

1. Why did Mark Ashton not tell Bess the whole story about the explosion and the recent attacks on Abbey Hall and his family, before she committed herself to visit there? Do you think that was fair? Would Bess have gone there anyway? Why does Bess spend her limited time in England trying to help the Ashtons instead of visiting her own family?
2. Philip Ashton makes no effort to defend himself when he's taken into custody. How does this affect the perception of his guilt? Was it pride --- or arrogance on his part?
3. Mrs. Ashton confides in Bess in much the same way that she might have confided in Ellie, who would have been her daughter-in-law. Why do you think this was? What did she see in Bess that she doesn't find in Clara?
4. Sergeant Lassiter is a frequent visitor to the series. What does his 'grapevine' tell you about the bonds between soldiers at the Front?
5. Bess tells Sergeant Lassiter that she hasn't given her heart to anyone. Do you think Bess might have feelings for someone that she'll feel free to express once the fighting is over?
6. Bess finds herself personally threatened several times, both in France and back in England. How is this danger different than the constant peril of being at war? How does she handle this threat to herself? What gives her the courage to go on, her training as a nurse? Her upbringing with the British Army? Or is it intrinsic in Bess herself?
7. What do you think makes Bess such a good nurse? Has reading about her work on the battlefield changed your picture of what these women did in the Great War? How do you think such service changed them? And what long term affect could it have on Bess's life when the war ends?
8. What did you make of the German pilot who flies over Bess's station and shoots at ambulances? Although he intentionally misses, what toll does it take on the drivers and wounded?
9. How do Bess and Mark Ashton balance their respective duties to their families, and to England and the war effort? What toll does it take on each of them to be pulled between these two loyalties?
10. Sergeant Rollins refuses to do anything to help the Ashtons, and his sister is even more adamant about seeing the family suffer. What do you think drives these two people, and others who feel the same way? Is it a question of class? Is it personal? Or were they already susceptible to quiet manipulation?
11. What do you think of the Ashtons' new barrister, Heatherton-Scott, and his valet? Henry has his own secrets but he is quite good at finding out information as his master's 'legs'. Not much is said about Henry's background. What do you suppose has made him so good at what he does? Do you find him intriguing?
12. What in your opinion is the difference between Corporal Britton and Captain --- now Lieutenant --- Collier? Both are killers, but they have different motivations. Do you think Collier has a conscience? His methods for convincing people to turn on the Ashtons worked. Why? Because of his skill --- or their need?
13. Does the plot resonate more with you because it is based on a true story, even though it is fictionalized here? How do you think such a loss of life affected the real village, emotionally and economically? Or the country as a whole, in the middle of a war, when gunpowder was essential to victory? Was the Army right to keep such a loss out of the press?

14. The comment is made, "What do you do, when you can't blame God?" In disasters, natural or manmade, do people often want to blame something or someone for their suffering and loss? What role do myth and superstition play in how people make sense of a tragedy? Is it human nature to look for blame? Or is it the shocking suddenness of loss that gives people no time to prepare or to mourn?

Author Bio

Charles Todd is the New York Times bestselling author of the Inspector Ian Rutledge mysteries, the Bess Crawford mysteries, and two stand-alone novels. A mother-and-son writing team, Caroline passed away in August 2021. Charles lives in Florida.

A Pattern of Lies: A Bess Crawford Mystery

by Charles Todd

Publication Date: April 12, 2016

Genres: Fiction, Historical Fiction, Historical Mystery, Mystery

Paperback: 352 pages

Publisher: William Morrow Paperbacks

ISBN-10: 0062386255

ISBN-13: 9780062386250